There was once a farmer who had taken over a piece of rough, untilled land. After five years of hard work he had changed it into a fertile field of luscious,green corn. One day the minister came by and spoke to the farmer: "My, how you and the Lord have succeeded in making this fertile field." To which the farmer replied: "That might all be, but you should have seen what a mess it was five years ago when the Lord had it all to himself." Under normal circumstances, the Lord helps those who help themselves.

So, in the same way, we cannot really expect peace unless we work at it ourselves. Christ said: "Blessed are the peacemakers." If there is one contribution that American philosophy can give to the world, it is the conviction that we can make our desires come true, and that unless we have the mind to do this they will not come true.

For instance, we no longer believe that depressions and prosperity are the product of chance, so that the lucky ones are born into periods of good times, and the unlucky ones into periods of hard times. The great Roosevelt experiment, even though it did not fully succeed in itself, did show us that a prosperous economy must be planned. We haven't learned all the rules for planning it yet, and also politicians may not be above breaking a few of the rules we do know for the sake of a few extra votes, but we have had sufficient success to know we are working in the right direction. We often read that two lovers get married and live happily ever after. If this really happens, it also is not the result of chance, but rather an effect that must be produced by following the rules, thinking about them, and working out new ones on the basis of experience with the old. A school also will not be a good one unless the relationships between the people involved are well thought out and integrated. All interhuman relationships need direction, planning, and the necessary work to put the plans into operation. Should peace among nations require less? World peace will come about in the same way—it will have to be made, it will not be the result of chance. It is up to man to learn how to produce peace. He can do this by analogy, by comparing with other situations. For instance, how is peace brought about between individuals, small groups, small nations? Perhaps similar conditions will produce peace over the whole world. Studying these results and using them, developing hypotheses about their interrelationship, testing these hypotheses in real situations, ought in this critical era of human experience do as much to bring about the desired results as it has done in other areas.

THE RECTOR'S HOMILY OCT.4

DAY OF PRAYER FOR PEACE

Remember then that two things are necessary: 1. prayer, asking that God coordinate all our efforts, so that they will add up to a worthwhile result; 2. work, inspired by, and planned according to what we can learn from the human experimentation found in books of history and our own memories. Maybe we could take a thought from the prayer of the Alcoholics Anonymous: "God give me the courage to change what I can change, the patience to put up with what I cannot change, and the wisdom to know the difference."

What is it that a Wawasee student takes with him that he might not take from another school? This is not an easy question to answer, but there is a feeling that the question has an answer.

Everyone pays lip service to the value of a broad liberal education. But in practice, society puts its emphasis upon science and economics. The coaches and the Fathers' Clubs put the emphasis upon sports. At most, religion is something extra—possibly important, but definitely not essential. And, to the student, school is too often something not to be taken seriously, sometimes only something to fill the time between proms.

However, the educators, commentators of the American scene, and psychologists point out with considerable insistence that modern man needs more than ever a full view of reality. Science, economics, sports, and sex are all unarguably valuable. But there is more to reality and a meaningful life.

In a way that general education no longer can, Wawasee does concentrate on providing the foundations that lead to a fuller view of reality. The homily, short story, essays, and spoof of modern art, here collected from the years' material, range knowingly through a wide variety of subjects: science, history, theology, man, art, etc. The reader will also note a faith both in the divine scheme and in the capabilities of man and a determined insistence upon man's responsibilities.

The day comes when the good times and the bad days at Wawasee are forgotten. But the graduate always bears two marks. The mark of his education—broad, yet not constricted by the passing fads of the day. And the mark of his having struggled—when it would have been easy to pack up—with a wide variety of values: religion, education, vocation, the better self, others. These are both experiences that do not come easy today, but they are part of what goes into making a true person, and the real leader.

ESSAY: M.Carey '67

IS GOD DEAD?

To me God is not dead but much more alive and real to people than He has ever been before. Never before was God such an open subject as He is today. People used to shy away from statements about God for one of two reasons. They either felt out of place talking about Him, or they were not sure of what to say. A lot of people thought if you couldn't talk about God as the Person the priest or parson talked about on Sunday in the sermon then you weren't really talking about God. And those who felt they should interpret God according to their own circumstances were—well, they weren't exactly appreciated by the community.

Why do I believe that God is so vividly alive to people today? Well, one Saturday, the 12th of November, I went to a speech contest at New Haven High School. Going into the first round, I thought that maybe I should have taken something more in the direction of God because people might expect it, because of my being from a Seminary. But then I decided that most of them would think I was just trying to preach to them or something. And I decided that a selection from Catcher In The Rye was more fitting to me because of my size and disposition. So I stayed as was.

Then a funny thing happened. The first contestant's speech centered around a rich family from the hills and their ideas about how they could give back to God some of that which He had given to them. Then another's told about the meaninglessness of the sacraments to some people. I'm not saying I agree with all of the things involved in the speech, but it had some very good points. These things seem unimportant, and they would be if they were the only instances of this sort of thing at the contest. but they weren't. I'd say about one third, if not more of the contestants, had speeches which in some way pointed toward God or some of His teachings. This means, since almost six hundred kids were there, that almost two hundred of them in some way felt they could interpret something about God, meaning they felt they could interpret God in the way they saw Him. Here at least two hundred teenagers were looking at God, thinking about Him, and. in a way, trying to say just what they felt.

But this is not the main point of the day, at least not to me. When I finished my speech, I went back to the cafeteria and started reading a book I had brought along with me concerning the question of whether or not God was dead. And I started talking to a girl sitting at the next table. She was from a public school and wasn't Catholic but she asked me, in the same way you'd say "what time it is?," "Do you think God is dead?" Just like that, right out of the blue, I said, "No, not as the world is starting to know Him today." And she said, "Good, it'd be a pretty sad world if everyone, or even as many as they say, thought so."

This, to me, was the best part of the day. Now, more than ever, I know that God is not dead. And those who think so are in a different world from mine and many peoples'. As William Alfred said in his play Hogan's Goat: "People who tell us there is no God are like a six-year old boy saying that their is no such thing as passionate love—they just haven't experienced it yet." People don't believe in God because they haven't really experienced, known Him yet.

This question "Is God Dead" has been with

Short Story: Tom Jozwik '68

VIETNAM

Now he was lingering in a makeshift hospital near Saigon. He had plenty of time to think—most of which he didn't want. "Why me? Three hundred and forty thousand American troops in this war alone. Most will live to tell about it . . . why me?"

An ugly war. A misunderstood war. An unappreciated war. He was a part of it. Dying—yet lingering in his sad shape. Dying—yet living . . . but for what? For a severed left leg? O God, it isn't worth it!

He hated the war, hated the Viet Cong, hated the place he was in, and, moreover, hated everything he ever loved.

Nobody understands, nobody cares. Here he is at the door of death, and nobody gives a hang. It's not the pain, it's not even the fear of death. It is the appalling fact that he is ready to die, and there is no one around who will give his death a second thought. Though he hated the fighting, he fought courageously . . . but nobody recognized it. Not the South Vietnamese, certainly not the Americans. He hated them all.

He's lying on a cot. He temporarily forgets and begins to think. He remembers something he has almost forgotten. He remembers sixteen years back, remembers seeing his older brother die.

Seven-year-old Mike was on his way to the store. He forgot to look both ways before he crossed busy Milwaukee Street and was hit by that big Ford. As if it were yesterday, he sees the crowd gathering, hovering over his brother. He hears the shrill siren of the ambulance again, clear as a bell.

But that was a long time ago. Now it's his turn to die and there is no screaming mother, no grief-stricken crowd, no ambulance siren. He will die alone.

Alone. He knew, better than most, what it meant to be alone. His family was poor, and his mother and father both worked. He was six when he first became, in a sense, independent. When friends played baseball at the park, he seldom did. He was forced to help his kid sister at home. In time, this isolated him from his friends, and all of a sudden, he found out that he didn't have any friends at all.

Now he is alone once again, and he is sick of it. It is now that he remembers better times. There was that girl he had met shortly before entering the service. He loved Doris and Doris loved him . . . but something happened. Had time made love pass? How could she have forgotten?

Finally, his thoughts take him back to Camp Leonard Wood and his basic training, the first crawl under live fire and the garbage detail.

The pain comes back, and so do the Viet Cong and the mortar shot that shattered his leg. He feels very odd, not sick, not spiteful. His thoughts cease and he rests comfortably. He somehow knows this is the end.

He's dead now. To the Army, another casualty. To his loved ones, a personal lost. But, to most of us, just another fact, another figure flashed across the screen during the 6:30 news cast.

us for a long time, only in different forms. Even in the time of Socrates men were asking themselves why there should be a god, and if there was one. Sure, to many God is the biggest hindrance they have. He's always the One who says "don't" all of the time. So they figure if they can put God out of their lives by saying He doesn't exist, there are no longer any more "don'ts." Then without anymore don'ts they will be free and happy and no more restrictions.

As Time points out, Langdon Gilky, of the University of Divinity School, says: "The basic Theological problem today is the reality of God." Does this seem strange? To me, somewhat, but then I've never had anything happen to me that I couldn't find a basic reason for. I mean I've never had something happen to me that I couldn't believe was happening, that I felt was unfair of God. But many people who lived through the ages of the Third Reich may ask themselves: "Is there a God, does He really exist? The reality and horror of the mass slaughter of over six million Jews doesn't hit us like it does those who lived through it. How could a thing this horrible happen when there is, if there is, a God who is all good and kind?

But these people often forget, because of the shock and harshness, that God lets man go his way, that man, to be man, must be free.

The problem with God today is not with God but with the fact that we need a God for the 20th century. As J. B. Phillips put it in his book Your God Is Too Small, "A God big enough for life, big enough to fit in with the new scientific age, big enough to command their highest admiration and respect, and consequently their willing co-operation.

BOOK REPORT: J. Paar '67

Evolution in Physics

The Evolution of Physics is an account of the growth of ideas in physical science from the earliest concepts to the more abstract theories of modern times. It is the story of mankind's attempt to acquire knowledge of the physical world.

The book leads the reader through four phases of modern physics: rise of the mechanical view, decline of the mechanical view, field and relativity, and finally, quanta.

The first part of the book, dealing with the rise of the mechanical view, relates the history of the development of the experimental procedures of such early and great physicists as Galileo, Newton, and Bacon and new concepts of motion and vectors that lead to the mechanical clock view of the universe.

Einstein and Infeld then review the decline of the mechanical view of the experiments as the physicists began to treat electricity and light. This section, although quite technical, provides a good summary of the theories of light and its velocity, and it explains waves, light waves, and color.

Relativity will always remain a difficult idea to grasp, but, as explained by Einstein and Infeld, "relativity" takes on a new form when viewed as part of the development of the field which is that area between the charges and particles because all things are in some way electrically charged. Relativity changes the laws of mechanics by the analysis of the time-space continuum and stresses that all laws are relative to each other in the areas of mass and energy.

The fourth main section of the book deals with the quantum theory, the emission or absorption of energy by atoms or molecules. The process is not continuous but takes place by steps, each step being the emission or absorption of an amount of energy taking place in matter and energy. The old mechanical clock notion of the universe finally gives way to a basically dynamic view.

The Evolution of Physics is recommended to all; it helps to make physics more lively, bringing the physical world in contact with the intellectual world. The book was written for easy reading and basically comes down to a chat between two famous authors and the reader.

"Not as smart as you look to it."
